danger of disruption. This whole controversy had become a war for political mastery, in which slavery only played the part of the let ter x in an algebraic equation, and was used only to work out the problem of disunion.—Did it ever occur to men of the North, when they were during the South to go out of the Union, that, when that disastrons event should be brought about, the great West, in the exercise of her sovereign will and pleasure, in the exercise of her sovereign will and pleasure, in the exercise of that popular sovereignty which would demand and would have non intervention, might also choose to set up for herself?—Did the phantom of a Western Confederacy mover hautot their nightly visions? The West had fed and clothed the North for sixty years. What would New York and Boston do? Dis-What would the North do without the West? What would New York and Boston do? Dis-selve this Union if you dare! Send off the Pacific States, force the West into a Confedera-Pacific States, force the West into a Confederacy, and where then would be their pride and insolence, their trade and commerce? What if New York and the other Northern States refeased to go with New England? For New England was a pe ulicar people, who had dethroned Jehovah and set up a deity of their own; and before a year had passed he predicted they would set up the statue of John Brown in the place of Daniel Websier. He thought the prophecy in a fair way to be fulfilled of the re-annexation of New England to the British Crown. Was it not better, then, for North and South, East and West, that the Union should be preserved? He was for the Union as it is, and the Constitution as it is, and against disand the Constitution as it is, and against dis union, now and forever. [Applause]

If he were asked whether the election of an anti-slavery sectional Frankest would be justifiable cause for diminion, he could not tell; but as a Western man he told the South that when they should, by a numerical sectional majority, elect a Southern President for the purpose of advancing Southern interests, and ordained for this country a higher, mightier, nobler destiny than for any other country since the world began.
